

Brian Gerrish says that this century has witnessed the revival of Calvin research as a Calvin renaissance." If we notice the abundance and variety of the publications in the annual Calvin bibliography in Calvin Theological Journal, without doubt we would agree with Gerrish that Calvin research is having its revival. One of the main reasons for this revival is because there are some Calvin research societies whose members meet regularly to share their research on Calvin. However, it seems that there are very few articles which discuss these research societies, their activities and publications. The authors of these articles only mention the societies, or have a brief summary of them, when they discuss Calvin research. The main purpose of this article, therefore, is to fill this gap and introduce the important societies and groups which do Calvin research and their publications. In this article, I will first explore the work of the International Congress for Calvin Research. This will be followed by an exploration of regional societies of Calvin research. In the final part of the article, two Calvin research centers, Meeter Center in the United States and the Institute for Calvinistic Studies in South Korea, will be introduced.
